Dear Speaker Johnson, Minority Leader Jeffries, Chairman Guthrie, and Ranking Member Pallone:

We are parents of children and teens who were hurt or died because social media companies designed their platforms to addict, exploit, and abuse America's young people. We write to you, as leaders of the U.S House of Representatives and the Committee on Energy and Commerce, with strong opposition to the new omnibus House bill that purports to include the Kids Online Safety Act (KOSA). The bill could jeopardize years of effort by parent and youth survivors, attorneys general, state lawmakers, our advocacy communities, and others to hold these companies accountable for the harms they have caused and, as written, would not make kids or teens safer online. We urge you not to pass this bill through the committee without significant changes.

The bipartisan version of KOSA that was introduced in both the House and the Senate last Congress, and that passed the Senate by a vote of 91-3, contained tangible, critical protections for kids including a meaningful duty of care, transparency requirements, protections for stronger state laws, and protections for the rights of injured youth and parents to file cases against tech companies in connection with design-based harms.

In this Congress, the Senate introduced the same bipartisan version which has the support of 75 cosponsors, while in the House we have seen Big Tech's influence with the stripping away of critical protections that now no longer exist as part of the bill. Instead, the bill contains few, if any meaningful protections for kids. It allows Big Tech to write their own rules and includes harmful language that could wipe out more protective state laws. The bill purports to protect children, but this is in name only. This is not what KOSA was meant to be, nor would we have ever voiced support for the Kids Online Safety Act had we known what the House would do.

Among the many fatal flaws within the bill, it would leave America's kids less safe than they are today because: 1) the knowledge standard in the bill lets tech companies turn a blind eye to minors on their platform, 2) the bill lets tech companies write their own rules by creating a weakened duty that only requires these companies to consider policies addressing harms, and 3) the bill's preemption provision will give Big Tech a path to put their incredible resources into wiping out more protective state laws. The bill's preemption provision threatens the cases brought and hard-fought by states, schools districts, and families across the country seeking to hold tech companies accountable for harms they chose as a matter of design.

Section 2 of the bill incentivizes tech companies to ignore information in their own possession and so that they can claim they do not "know" when a child is using their platforms. The bill lets tech companies avoid accountability by simply pointing to things like self-identified age: a type of data they know to be inaccurate and, in fact, do not even rely on themselves when it comes to product development and targeted advertising. The only way to keep our children safe online is to hold these companies accountable if they reasonably should have known a user is a minor. Title II, Section 201 also gives a pass to any platform that finds a way to monetize users without requiring creation of a username— as Google does for millions of children currently and deliberately. This is not protection.

Title II, Section 213 does not provide for reasonable and meaningful obligations, it simply requires these companies to create policies, practices, and procedures – something they claim to do already. This not only strips the stronger bipartisan duty of care but flips that duty on its head and in a manner that Big Tech can use to argue a conflict with existing state laws. Our children and families do not need more promises from Big Tech. We need safety by design. We need real duties and real action by our lawmakers.

Title II, Section 221 of the bill contains preemption language that would wipe out state laws and regulations that are far more protective of kids and teens than this version of KOSA as well as threaten the ability of state Attorneys General, school districts, and families like ours to pursue justice against Big Tech for the unimaginable harm they have brought to our families and communities. The preemption language in this, combined with letting tech companies write their own rules and watered down obligations throughout, guarantees that tech companies will only be asked to follow the weakest policies that the companies themselves write, and any attempt to hold them to a higher standard of safety and transparency will be derailed by this bill and the procedural advantages these companies already have due to their resources and control of critical data.

Last summer, certain lawmakers attempted to enact preemption provisions at the behest of the tech industry in the field of AI. The American public forcefully responded, making clear that preemption for an industry that has profited from design-based based harms for more than a decade is not acceptable. Families and advocates joined forces and mobilized to prevent such preemption then, and we are prepared to do so again now.

In addition to all of these issues on the bill's face, we ask that our lawmakers consider the fact that countless tech industry documents have recently begun to be unsealed because, and only because, of the lawsuits families like, and including, ours were able to file – lawsuits that would be in jeopardy under this omnibus bill. This includes company documents admitting to addiction by design, to mental health harms like anxiety, depression, and body dysmorphia being caused by their design decisions (harms these companies admitted to internal, but lied about to the American public), and a myriad of other issues that are directly relevant to what our laws must address. Because this makes no rational sense, it is left to our imaginations to ponder the motivation behind the House's inclination to pass a weak and ineffective version of KOSA now, as those truths finally are being released into the public record and just weeks before the first of many verdicts to come in litigation already pending against Big Tech.

As such, we strongly urge you to oppose this bill and to act on the bipartisan version of KOSA that is pending in the Senate, and that has the support of countless parents and organizations. Or to hold and wait until you have the information needed to make informed choices, rather than tech-informed choices. Legislating isn't easy. We understand this. But progress takes strength and courage, and we are asking you to find that strength and courage. We are asking you to stand up to the powerful interests in the tech industry and to stand with America's parents and children instead. We will always stand up for children, and we ask you to do the same and oppose this omnibus bill.

Sincerely,

Karen G., mother to plaintiff K.G.M.
